

The FCC should take no action that in any way weakens or undermines the intent of New Jersey's Do Not Call Law. The fact that I chose to do business with someone in the last 18 months is not license to contact me to solicit other business. Given mergers and acquisitions among prominent telemarketing offenders targeting middle class families, like credit card companies, mortgage companies and phone companies, what companies would not be able to contact someone? If the special interests won loopholes in Washington over regular people on the federal Do Not Call program it is all the more important not to gut New Jersey's program. The elected officials of the State of New Jersey have acted in response to the people on this. Federal administrators and national lobbyists should not be able to take that away. Let's see who the FCC, the Bush Administration and the Republican Congress support when they have to choose - telemarketers or regular people.
